Theory \leq SVM $<$ Implementation

Filed under: Datawarehousing — kocakahin @ 2:00 pm

Tags: data mining, svm, theoretical, machine learning

Sometimes I find opportunities to perform theoretical presentations. Final one was on Support Vector Machines to young engineers in Turkcell Technology. SVM is not just one of the machine learning algorithms with strong theoretical settlement but also trying to understand SVM, let us play with various theoretical stuff like linear algebra, optimization theory, topology, etc. to build up a machine learner.

Keep in mind that this presentation is just a very brief introduction to SVM. Implementation details require a separate presentation. So the name of my presentation is theory \leq SVM $<$ implementation. I hope you enjoy it.

Presenting at Croatian Oracle User Group - HROUG

This week I'll be presenting at Croatian Oracle User Group Conference (HROUG) which will take place in Rovinj in Croatia, a beautiful old city in Istria at the Adriatic coast.

HROUG is a very strong and active user group. Every year they organize excellent conference, so this year it is already the 15th. Last year I was presenting about execution plan stability and my presentation was selected as the best presentation in the "Database and Technology" track.

Rovinj is only about 2.5 hour drive away from my home in neighbor country. My presentation is scheduled for Thursday, 21.10.2010 at 15:00 hours and I will repeat my presentation from Oracle Open World 2010. Friday morning I'll be talking about the Oracle ACE Program together with other Oracle ACEs / ACE Directors who will be there as well. Currently Croatia has no Oracle ACE yet. Therefore the Croatian Oracle User Group would like to make people aware of this Oracle program and at the same time they would like to discuss their first nominations.
